

(Robert M. Merck)

Celluloid Christmas light bulbs were produced for a very short time in Japan. Some contained tiny beads so that when they burned out they could still function as a child's rattle or toy. Though popular due to their detailed molding and painting, their susceptibility to heat and fire made them impractical. (Robert M. Merck)